On the Move Again

I just came back into the city a few days ago. The time has filled up with the usual pack, unpack, settle a bit, and then a variety of different errands needing to get done. Once more the fun of renewing my driver's license, which was anything but straightforward. My thought as I worked my way through the confusion was that this could be the poster child for inefficiency and disorganization. Oh well, at least it did finally get done after 2 days of running around. Well it evidently will take 6-8 months to actually get the card in hand, but the pink slip is proof enough to do the job.

And once more I am heading out tomorrow (5th) to Thailand. I will be doing a bunch of medical checks again, including following up with the GI doctor. Things have been improved, but still not totally running 'normal'. I also will be having a minor surgery done, while I have the opportunity. I've given a couple weeks in Bangkok to get through everything, have plenty of time if more appointments are needed, and be sure to be recovered. Then I will be moving on down to Phuket to attend a retreat, which I am really looking forward to. Due to return here on the 26th.

While I'm really looking forward to the warm climate for a while, I also am anticipating plenty of time to just spend with our Father. Amongst other things, I will be seeking His direction for the future or at least to know the next step He has for me. I'd appreciate your intercession for sweet fellowship with Him and that I would be open to hear clearly.

I was pleasantly surprised to get a bit of a view of the mountains, since the thick fogs down below block it. Getting above the clouds has it's advantages.

This was kind of fund to discover from an App as we were flying. I'll admit it took quite a few tries, but you can see the names and heights of some of the mountains we see. Hard to believe this is only this one little section, which you see in the distance on the left.

Thanks for being alongside, Becky
